The growth in population of Wyoming was slow during the Indian wars, first, from the natural evidence of danger, and second, from the exclusion of white people from the best lands in the territory. The government surveys were also impeded except along the line of the railroad, where the population was gathered into towns. The legislature of 1875 established two counties in the northern portion of the territory, which had not enough white inhabitants for the four years following to organize. The amount of land which had been entered for settlement in 1876,...
